RSB extends services to the northern suburbs

The Royal Society for the Blind (RSB) has extended its services to more than 1,200 clients living in the northern suburbs.

The new RSB Smithfield Office will be officially opened tomorrow morning by the HON Jennifer Rankine MP at 10:30am.

The Smithfield Office will provide a range of comprehensive services including adaptive technology, employment services, recreation and leisure services, mobility and orientation services and the RSB Guide Dog Service to South Australians who are blind or vision impaired.

“This new facility illustrates the RSB’s commitment to meeting the growing needs of our clients. We are now able to service clients in the northern suburbs, including Smithfield, Gawler, the Barossa and the Clare Valley, to name a few,” said RSB Executive Director, Andrew Daly.

The office has been made possible by a generous bequest of more than $250,000.

Other special guests to attend the opening include Member for Torrens, Robyn Geraghty, Mayor, City of Playford, Martin Lindsell, and Mayor, Town of Gawler, Brian Sambell.

The RSB is the primary provider of services to people who are blind or vision impaired in South Australia.
